Subject: SB 1127 (Atkins) – Workers' Compensation PTSD Presumption
REQUEST FOR VETO

Dear Governor Newsom,

The undersigned organizations are OPPOSED to SB 1127 (Atkins), which proposes to truncate the claims review process required of employers without giving them the tools to make decisions more quickly. SB 1127 reduces the timeline for employers to make a decision about covering workers' compensation insurance claims covered by a presumption statute from 90 to 75 days, and it imposes penalties as high as $50,000 per claim if an employer unreasonably rejects liability for one of these workers' compensation claims. Yet, the bill inexplicably declines to change the state-dictated claim investigation process and procedures that have not only been proven dysfunctional by the state auditor, but is also based on regulations that are wildly inconsistent with the proposed reduction to 75 days in SB 1127.

SB 1127 is about the need for our workers' compensation system to make better and faster decisions about accepting claimed injuries, and our coalition does not object to having a rational stakeholder discussion about how to achieve that outcome. However, SB 1127 can't credibly be described as a pathway to making better and faster decisions because it doesn't do anything other than shorten the timeframe given to employers to investigate a workers' compensation claim. It changes absolutely nothing in terms of the investigation process and procedure that is completely dictated by California statute and regulations. In fact, it doesn't even delay implementation to allow the Division of Workers' Compensation to utilize existing regulatory authority to make changes that might ease implementation and improve chances of success.

Even if you support the idea of making better and faster decisions about workers' compensation claims, we believe, respectfully, that you should VETO SB 1127 and encourage stakeholders to work together on reforms that are acceptable to both employers and workers.

SB 1127 has three main provisions, all of which are problematic:

- Reduces the timeframe allotted to employers to investigate rebuttable presumption claims: SB 1127 proposes to shorten the time provided for employers to investigate claims from 90 to 75 days. The bill does not, however, make a single change to the statutory and regulatory provisions that cause investigations to take more than 90 days.
- Imposes massive new penalties on employers: SB 1127 proposes new and unprecedented penalties on all claims covered by presumption statutes, including the COVID-19 presumption that applies to every employer in the state. The penalty would apply in situations where "liability has been unreasonably rejected for claims of injury" and would be five times the amount of benefits unreasonably delayed, up to $50,000. These claims – most of which are for public sector public safety employees and are funded by taxpayers – would, as proposed, now have a higher standard of evidence because of the presumption, an objectively inadequate timeline to investigate claims, and now massive penalties for getting that process wrong.
- More than doubles duration of temporary disability for cancer presumption claims: SB 1127 would extend the duration of temporary disability benefits from 104 to 240 weeks for claims covered by cancer presumption statutes. Covered employees currently have full and tax-free wage replacement benefits for one full year, and have access to disability retirement benefits that can, in some cases, be received at the same time as temporary disability benefits. SB 1127 does not necessarily, as described by proponents, create a guarantee that an injured worker will have wage loss benefits available if they face a recurrence of their cancer. As drafted, that employee could use all five years of the disability during the initial treatment period and would then still not have benefits available if there is a recurrence.

The laws of the State of California already provide for a fair and equitable system for all workers. Our workers' compensation system is "no fault", meaning that employers pay for benefits even if there was no specific negligence. Additionally, state law requires the workers' compensation appeals board judges to "liberally construe" the laws of the state toward the provision of benefits. These two statutory requirements make our workers' compensation system extremely accessible for injured workers. A recent analysis from the California Workers' Compensation Institute found that while California represents only 12% of the nation's jobs and 14.4% of national payroll, California employers provide 19.7% of all cash and medical benefits provided to injured workers.

We provide more detailed explanations along with substantial data, analysis, and examples below.

SB 1127 DOES NOT PROVIDE SUFFICIENT TIME TO INVESTIGATE CLAIMS

The enrolled version of SB 1127 proposes to reduce the investigation period from 90 to 75 days (the introduced bill reduced the investigation period to 30 days). That change, while substantial, is entirely unresponsive to every objection we've made to this proposed policy for the last two years. Whether the investigation period is reduced to 75 or 30 days, our objection remains the same. That objection is simple – SB 1127 requires employers complete investigations more quickly but provides no remedy for the systemic limitations imposed by the state that prevent employers from achieving that outcome.

We strongly oppose changes to the investigation period because it undermines the due process rights of both the injured worker and the employer. As will be discussed below, ensuring a fair, impartial investigation that protects the rights of both parties equally and fairly takes time, and, in some cases, it just takes longer than 30, 75, and sometimes 90 days.

When an employee claims a work-related injury or illness their employer must decide whether to accept liability or investigate further. Not every claimed injury is valid and a portion of them are, in fact, fraudulent. Wisely, rather than permitting an employer to assert that a claim is fraudulent and walk away, California has created a comprehensive investigatory process with strict standards. This process takes time, but it also protects the due process rights of both the employers and injured workers, maintaining the delicate balance that allows the California workers' compensation system to function.

This is particularly important for public employers who have injured workers with presumptive occupational injuries. Presumption statutes apply to injuries and illnesses such as heart, cancer, and PTSD that are complex in causation and sometimes difficult for workers to connect to employment. That is, in fact, why the legislature has historically chosen to impose a presumption that shifts the legal burden of proof away from employees and instead requires an employer to prove that the claimed injury was not caused by employment. Presumptions might be rebuttable in name, but they already impose a near-impossible task by requiring employers to "prove a negative" (e.g., that a cancer is not caused by employment). This requires a more thorough investigation that, as will be discussed below, cannot be completed in 90 days, let alone 75.

The Investigation Process

California law requires employers to "conduct a reasonable and timely investigation upon receiving notice or knowledge of an injury or claim." The regulations expressly prohibit an employer from restricting an investigation to "preparing objections or defenses to a claim." Instead, employers must "fully and fairly gather the pertinent information, whether that information requires, or excuses benefit payment." Finally, the employer is required to document the investigatory acts undertaken and the information obtained as a result. Taken together, the law requires employers to conduct a thorough investigation of all relevant facts, which both protects their due process rights and the injured worker's due process rights by creating a full, impartial record of the events.

During the investigation period an employer or their insurer needs to interview the supervisor, employee, witnesses, and medical providers to get a baseline understanding of the situation. Employers must obtain relevant medical records, documents related to prior claims, schedule a medical evaluation, receive a complete written report from the doctor, and potentially identify and recover additional records that might be relevant to the claimed injury. Simply put, in some cases this process takes longer than the 75 days provided under SB 1127.

Specifically, Labor Code Section 4060 requires a medical evaluation by a panel of qualified medical evaluators (QMEs) if a medical evaluation is needed to determine liability. This process breaks down as follows for an employee that is not represented by counsel (the rules for represented employees have only minor differences that do not materially reduce the timeframe for completion):

- For claims where the employee is not represented by counsel, an employer must wait 10 days after the filing of a claim form to request a Panel QME from the state [8 CCR §31.3(a)].
- Once a Panel QME is requested, the state has 10 days to provide the panel to the parties so they can select a medical evaluator from the list provided.
- Once the Panel is issued, the employee has 10 days to select a medical evaluator from the list, set the appointment, and notify the employer. If the employee does not select an evaluator after ten days, then the employer can select an evaluator and set the appointment [8 CCR §31.3(d)].
- The party scheduling the appointment must secure an appointment within 60 days, or 90 days if an evaluation can't be scheduled within 60 days [8 CCR §31.3(e)].

-75-day investigation clock in SB 1127 runs out here-

- Once the evaluation has been completed the medical evaluator has an additional 30 days to complete and submit the comprehensive medical report that will determine liability [8 CCR §38(a)].

In addition, the California State Auditor has conducted a review of the state-run Panel QME process and found that it is slower-than-intended because there are not enough medical evaluators available to meet the increasing demand. In fact, while demand for Panel QME reports increased by 37%, the number of QME doctors available decreased by 12%. The system for providing the medical evaluations and reports needed to determine liability is not functioning correctly. Shockingly, SB 1127 avoids addressing these deficiencies in any way.

During this investigative period, the injured worker receives up to $10,000 of medically necessary treatment, free of charge to them. This employer funded medical treatment ensures that the injured worker is not adversely impacted by this investigative period. Even if the employer is found later to not be liable and the claim is denied, the injured worker does not need to pay a cent back. This balances the rights and responsibilities of employers and injured workers, maintaining a fair and equitable system.

NEW PENALTIES MAKE TAXPAYER FUNDED PRESUMPTION CLAIMS DANGEROUS TO INVESTIGATE

Additionally, SB 1127 proposes harsh new penalties for employers who "unreasonably" reject liability for claims covered by presumption statutes. SB 1127 mandates a penalty of five times the value of benefits delayed or denied, with a maximum penalty of $50,000.

*Example: An employer is found to have unreasonably denied a claim and the employee has $5,000 worth of temporary disability benefits and $5,000 worth of medical care delayed or denied as a result. Under SB 1127 the employer would be penalized $50,000. Under these provisions the penalty cap will be reached in *most claims* that are found to have been "unreasonably denied".*

This impacts both public and private employers because these penalty provisions apply not only to the severe injuries and illnesses found in the public safety presumption statutes, but also to the COVID-19 presumption which applies to every employer in the state. Similarly, all these claims will be held to the 30-day investigation period, which all but guarantees that a legally sufficient investigation cannot be conducted within the allotted timeframe.

Finally, the new penalties in SB 1127 applies to all injuries without regard to the date of injury. This means that the penalty portion of the bill would apply retroactively to decisions that were made prior to the date of enactment. Not only is this fundamentally unfair to employers, but it will add significantly to the litigation and friction associated with the bill.

MORE THAN DOUBLES TEMPORARY DISABILITY BENEFITS

SB 1127 more than doubles the period of temporary disability that is available to firefighters and police officers covered by the cancer presumption. The peace officers and firefighters covered by the cancer presumption are also eligible for one year of complete wage replacement benefits instead of temporary disability, not to mention disability retirement benefits that are unavailable to other workers. We oppose the vast expansion of temporary disability benefits as proposed by SB 1127 because we are unaware of any data that would suggest this is necessary or desirable.
